

Before July 10, 2025 — White Employee Assisted With Hardship Fund

A few weeks before July 10, I assisted Brandi Cordi, a White employee on my team, with obtaining hardship fund assistance because she was facing eviction.

This is important comparator context. I had already helped a White employee access the hardship fund without being told this created a concern.

July 10, 2025 — Black Employee Needed Housing Support

I learned that one of my Black employees Araksan Dide was homeless. I reached out to Allan Glover to see whether we could pursue hardship fund assistance for her so she could obtain housing.

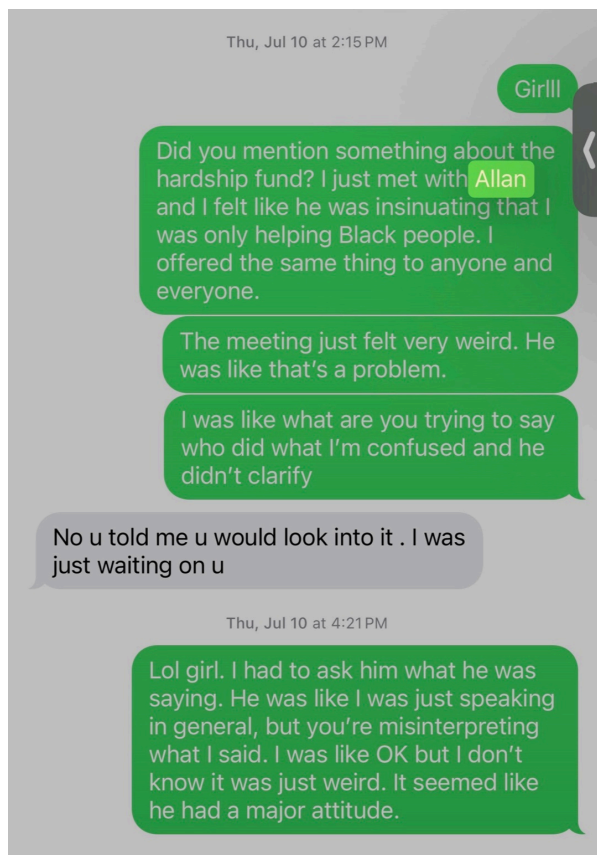

July 10, 2025 — Meeting With Allan Glover

During the meeting, Allan told me we should hold off. He gave an example involving Black employees, stating in substance that if one Black employee told another Black employee and then that person tried to get the hardship fund, that could be a serious problem.

I did not immediately respond because I was shocked and confused by the example.

July 10, 2025 — Text to Coworker Immediately After Meeting

After the meeting, I texted a coworker who had been asking about the hardship fund. I asked whether she had mentioned anything about the hardship fund because I had just met with Allan and felt like he was insinuating that I was only helping Black people

July 10, 2025 — Teams Follow-Up to Allan Glover

After the meeting, I messaged Allan directly in Teams to clarify the discussion.

Visible Teams message states:

“Hey Allan! I wanted to follow up on our discussion earlier today regarding Simone and supporting employees within policy. I just wanted to clarify I was just doing my due diligence in a neutral way. And I clearly understand the attendance policy and that we have to operate within that. I don’t want you to think that I was requesting anything outside of that.”

I also wrote:

“To be honest, I was a little caught off guard and confused about the example that you used. I just wanna make sure I didn’t misunderstand what you were saying lol if you can provide some clarification I would greatly appreciate it.”

Allan responded:

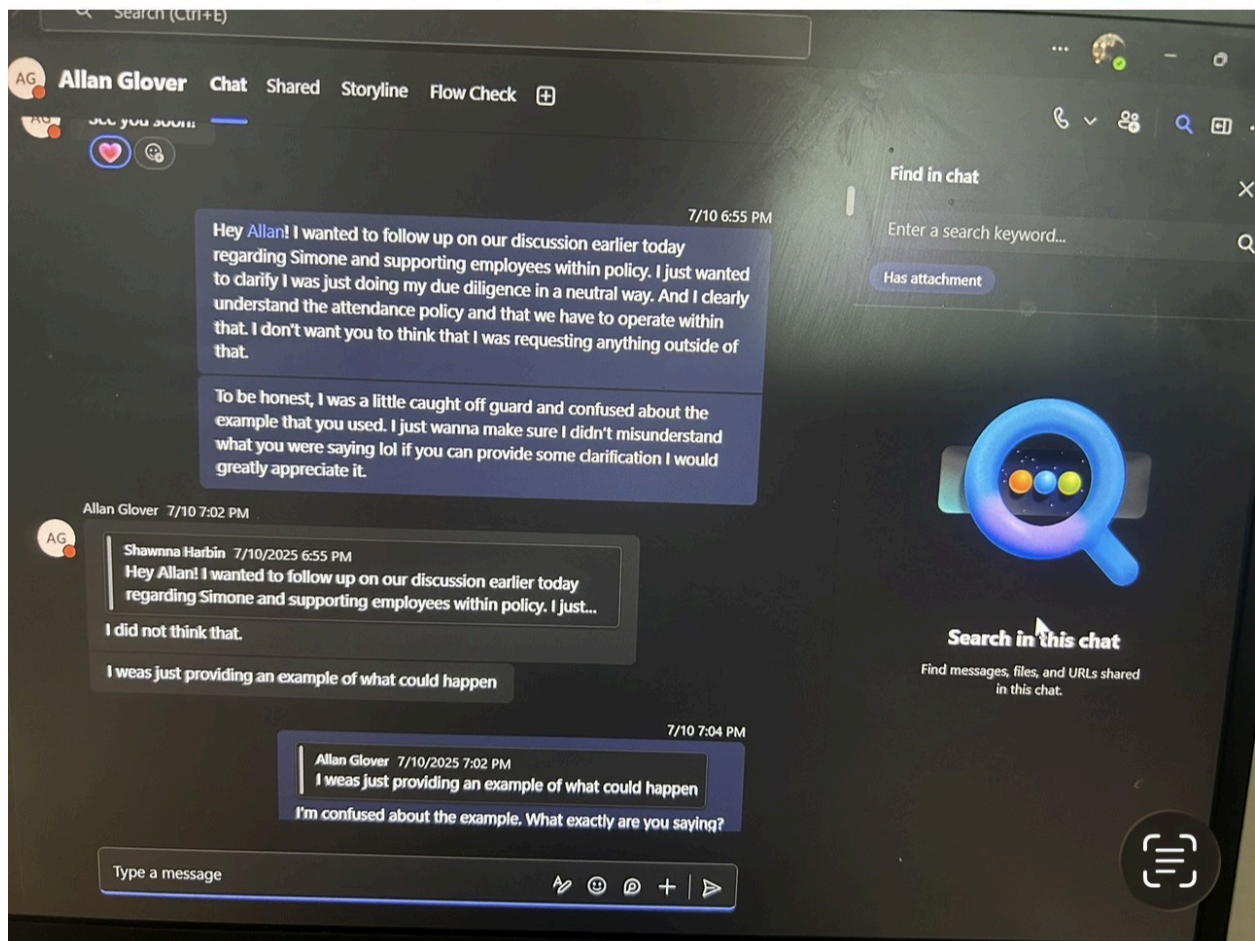

"I did not think that."

And:

"I was just providing an example of what could happen."

I replied:

"I'm confused about the example. What exactly are you saying?"

July 10, 2025 — Allan Called After I Asked for Clarification

After I replied in Teams, “I’m confused about the example. What exactly are you saying?”, Allan called me directly.

During that call, Allan sounded angry and asked me:

“What exactly are you trying to get to?”

I explained that I felt like his example suggested we should not help a Black employee, and I asked why it would matter if one Black employee told another Black employee about the hardship fund. Allan did not provide a clear explanation. He only repeated that it “could be a problem.”

Same Day — Coworker Witness/Contemporaneous Disclosure

I also told coworkers, including Alison Murphy and another coworker, about the incident the same day because I was shocked by Allan’s comment.

July 10, 2025 — Compliance Concern Raised During Same Meeting

During the same July 10, 2025 meeting, I also raised a compliance concern involving returned mail indicators, customer statement non-receipt, late fees, and payment history. I explained that customers could still be assessed late fees even when statement non-receipt or returned mail was not properly reflected in the system, and agents were unable to properly correct or adjust the issue.

I raised this in good faith because I believed it could involve Regulation Z/TILA compliance, internal controls, improper fee retention, remediation exposure, and public-company disclosure risk if the issue was systemic.

Allan appeared very frustrated by the concern. Rather than clearly addressing the issue, he told me in substance that I needed to keep my head down because there was a lot going on within the company.
